

Learn More: The second largest country in the world by land area is mostly uninhabitable. Although it covers 3.86 million square miles, most of Canada's 37 million people live within 100 miles of the U.S. border. A whopping 90 percent of Canadians are quite chummy with their southern neighbors, and it's largely due to agriculture. The land in this area is the most arable, and the weather up north is much colder. While the border isn't quite the tropics, it's the most favorable climate Canada has to offer.
